To evaluate the short- and medium-term functional outcomes of transobturator vaginal mesh (TVM) inserted for the treatment of stress urinary incontinence (SUI) in patients with a urethral hypermobility syndrome. Fifty-three patients (mean age 56.5) underwent TVM placement after a previous contralateral TVM (either pubovaginal or TVM with pubovaginal compression) for the treatment of SUI. A TVM with a polypropylene mesh was placed through the retropubic space through a transobturator approach, according to a standard technique; meshes were removed at a mean of 8.9 months postoperatively. In the first and second postoperative periods, the patients underwent standardized videourodynamic testing, filled the Urogenital Distress Inventory-6 questionnaire, and underwent an objective pad test. The mean follow-up was 31.4 months. The success rate was 91.5%. Videourodynamics showed that postoperatively, 88.7% of patients had no maximum urethral closure pressure (MUCP). Thirty-eight percent of patients had intermittent leakage, and 28.4% had stress leakage. At the last follow-up, 92.6% of patients complained of no or slight discomfort, 53.8% of patients stated that their quality of life improved, and 53.8% of patients stated that their subjective cure rate was high
